Parting thought from Andrew "When you come to fork in the road, take it"

People smile when they hear the old Yogi Berra quote, "When you come to fork in the road, take it.". But, the really funny thing is how accurate this suggestion is. Once again, we the people are at a fork in the road and once again it looks like we are going to choose to stand still rather than choose one of the forks.

The fact that we the people are avoiding, like the plague, is the fact that, in its current state, our system has more people in it than it can handle successfully. You can only cut a pie into so many slices before nobody has enough to eat. What is needed is a redefining of our resources.

The days of pretending that we only need a tweak to get things back on track are over. Kiwi people need and deserve a frank discussion that outlines what tools we have and do not have at our disposal. After that discussion, we need to willingly realign our priorities and use our resources to reach a conclusion that is the best solution possible rather than simply hoping things will fix themselves.

We all need food, shelter, education and jobs. We all need access to health care. We all need to not only hope our system is working, we all need to know it is working as best it can.

In short: This foolishness of dividing into two or more camps and blaming each other for all problems has got to stop.

Are we a nation of grownups or are we a nation of kids pretending to be grownups?
